SOUTHERN DOMESTIC ECONOMY

The following is an extract from a forthcoming article entitled "Home-Life in the of the family, and paid twice as much. South," and is from the pen of Professor HOWARD MILLER, Elk Lick, Pa., whose writings has found a place in the columns of South that is repugnant to the person of the Dispatch before. The southern citizen northern instincts. The interests of labor will find a good deal in the practical ideas and capital are identical; but how can the presented by Mr. Miller that is entitled to native carelessness and petty theits, while his consideration as wisely suggestive. We the white man, with a thousand years' eduwould vary some of the views expressed to give them greater accuracy; but we must roads, and shops, tearing up the one and all confess that there is plainly a desire on the part of the writer to be both just and fair in the statements made by bim, It and those who read his article that elimate accounts in part for many sectional differences upon which he animadverts.

The great truth, however, which he eneconomical system to accommodate themselves to their changed condition-is one to not believe that they desire to do so, and monest negro South. The women of the household are, acplishments of the literary and musical marsuppose that for the sake of the moral characters of the writers of such books the condition of things as represented actually existed in days gone by, but he who would find such a state of affairs now should start ont as did Diogenes in search of an honest Before the war-that great point in south-

Everything within the homes of a majority of people South indicate a condition of comes out an increased value. Every inmate things now obsolete. In other words, the war stripped them of their convertible property, and honest poverty is everywhere. The furniture and fittings are of a decade or two back, and the general warmth of tone, the pictured wall, the carpeted floor, the glowing fire in the grate, are all wantthe North, and a couple of young ladies, whose parents were wealthy, coming from marked this peculiarity of carpeted floors everywhere-a thing they had not known

In those upon it. portions of the South where the two sections have had an opportunity of coming together, there is little difference. Thus number of solutions; but we can't publish the tourist down the Cumberland Valley, in Pennsylvania, may continue his journey via Harper's Ferry into the Shenandoah and not find things much changed by latitude. It is when you get into sections removed from railroad communication that you find everything different.

The speech of the two sections is widely different. It is most difficult to describe the differences, for outside the provincialisms characteristic of every section of the inhabitable globe there is a set, an accent, not to be described on paper. The words are mouthed more, and of course the New England dialect is as observable to the Virginian as theirs to us.

The editors of the city papers, the Gov-ernor and the State officials generally, have not the southern peculiarity we write of, and along the great thoroughfares the characteristic accent is not heard. In the real Virginia home, away from the great crowd, the peculiar phrases and the southern dialect is observable.

Perhaps no more nonsense has ever been written than concerning the cuisine of the South. The grand lay-outs of culinary tri-umphs recorded by the romancing scribbler are all either history or fiction, for they acterize digestive irregularity and weakness, and do not now exist. Take Ford's Hotel at Richmond, the Carrollton at Baltimore, and the Astor of New York, and the dinners do not differ sufficient to excite comment. The cooks are professionals—scholars in their line-and in the country the food is prepared by a slouchy negress, detailed or hired for the work. Food of good quality is in abundance, and of great variety; yet the preparation confided to some colored woman, in a back shed, without a stove and only the embers to cook on, in every instance coming under the writer's notice, is in inferior to the product of the intelligent farmer's wife of the northern hills. There is a wonderful lack of uniformity in the culinary line through the South. With all the natural advantages necessary to produce the best the earth affords, the recurring pork and corn-bread in its different

Comparing the two sections. North and South, so far as the moral quality of hospifality and the virtues that go to make it up are concerned, the advantage is on the side of the South, while in respect to superior conditions physically considered, the surroundings of the average northern home are far ahead of those South in the same rank in life. The waste in southern house keeping is something appalling where anything of an establishment is kept up. The leaks through the carelessness or disholvesty of servants is something that would be stopped at once in the well-regulated house. North, and the old fling at the stinginess and selfishness of the Yankee will have to be appalled.

It is true that they are cheap as far as the first expenditure of wages is concerned, but the writer will venture the assertion that a weman bired at four dollars per month as cook, if she has a family, as they generally have, occupying some of the control of the same of the control of the control of the control of the same of the control of the same of the control of th old slave cabins, will cost the family more by considerable than the neat white domestic, quartered in the house, treated as one There is really an indefinable something about the system of petty capital and labor in the domestic economy of the household cation, now and then raids on moneys, railburning the other, because of a dime's difference of opinion as to wages?

Many a northern family who would employ a paragon of neatness, skill, and cleanshould not be forgotten by Mr. MILLER liness, in the shape of a colored cook, would most effectually drive away from their table all their neighbor-guests. Of course, it is a blind, unreasoning, and unreasonable prejudice, but it exists just as much as people's belief in ghosts. There deavors to impress upon his readers—that is no nonsense about the average norththe southern people must pursue a more ern girl respecting work. Many a girl can and does teach school acceptably, and is respected by everybody; yet she thinks it not out of the way to hire as which they cannot shut their eyes. Breakfast at 8 o'clock, and the summer resort, into which so many houses are now turned by impecunious guests, will be effectually forgotten in the economical struggle to leave the world a smoother path for the children than the parent. What will become of the colored element is a question concerning which the answer can only be conjectured; but it is certain that the present mismating of dignity and idleness will have to give way to the union of true dignity and honorable labor by those who must be producers of something and who are not independently rich. The writer, when a teacher, used to ask "Suppose you are thirty years old, widowetuated his kind.
